SKETCHES OF LITTLE

OLD NEW YORK
BY O. O. McINTYRE

Telegram Bureau: Rooms 131-135 Hotel Majestic, West Seventy-second Street.

NEW YORK, Oct. 25.—Many years ago when college professors were wondering whether they would have to resign so that they could pursue special courses to catch up with me I met George F. Brenn on a college campus. He was wearing a postage stamp cap and trousers that looked like a country fair balloon just about to soar to the clouds.

As I remember it the exact amount that it cost him was a half dollar. Afterward I lost track of him and made no special effort to find him—for, well a half dollar is a half dollar. The other afternoon I ran onto him on Fifth Avenue. Or rather he nearly ran across me in an automobile that looked like it had more cylinders than Mr. Carter has pills.

I had heard of through the newspapers from time to time. He became associated with James O'Brien, the big broker, and in a few short years was taken into the firm. Now he is under thirty years of age and can if he wishes go down to Philadelphia on his week ends and take a good laugh at the mint.

"New York," he says, "presents more opportunities for the young man than any other city and I have tried many of them. I decided at the start that drinking and smoking were not necessary to my success and might be a barrier and so I eschewed them. I began working fifteen and sixteen hours a day. I was only a clerk but my boss soon was attracted to me and kept promoting me until he took me into the firm."

"And by the way," he remarked, "Oh yes," I said hastily, "about that half dollar. Here it is now."

He said he had forgotten all about it. That is the way with rich men. A half dollar means nothing in their lives. But he ~~was~~ the same.

Enter Caruso, a trimly cut business suit of robin's egg blue. A weakling in fact—was his chief concern when he came into the city. Caruso takes up his quarters at the Knickerbocker across from the Metropolitan where he will warble.

He has been to his villa in Bellaguarda raising chickens. But he does not like this especial kind of poultry. In fact they ruffled his nerves. Being temperamental is an awful thing.

He drew pictures for the reporters told them funny stories but declined an invitation to go to an Italian restaurant near the pier and gargle spaghetti. When he eats spaghetti he wants lots of room.

Lee Magee, the ball player, and a party of friends stopped at a country hotel near New York the other night. They stepped into the parlor after registering and having dinner. One of them sat down at the piano and started to play. The proprietor appeared and looked worried.

"We just want to play and sing a few songs before we go to bed," explained Magee. The proprietor scratched his head. "Wal," he drawled at last, "I suppose it's all right so long as you don't pass the hat."

There was a great commotion in a very exclusive downtown hotel the other afternoon. It seems that a gentleman from the West all highly perfumed and no place to go smiled at a very chic young woman sitting in the lobby. She flashed back a smile and soon they were sipping tea together in one of the team rooms.

They were behind potted palms and evidently the tea affected them. All of a sudden the gentleman gave a blood curdling yell. Attendants rushed toward them. "I've been robbed," he wailed. "This woman has touched me for my roll of $500." And then he wept.

House detectives escorted the woman to a private office and female detectives searched her. They found the roll of bills in her golden tresses. No arrests.
